

I wish to apply to the Doctorate in Higher Education at The University of Memphis. This is a brief description of why I wish to apply to the graduate degree program. The decision made by me to pursue an education from this University is influenced by a mix of factors including my academic background, professional experiences, and a powerful wish to contribute meaningfully to the field of educational research and measurement.

Since my Bachelor of Arts degree in Sociology was conferred in June 2018, I have been able to gain work experience in various fields and also taken a few development courses which have helped me to find myself. To further buttress on my points, my motivation to undertake graduate work stems from my passion for my own personal development. Following this, I pursued a Master of Science in Criminology and Security Studies from the National Open University of Nigeria. This program made my understanding of the problems of human behavior, societal structures, and the importance of meticulous research in addressing social issues even deeper. Through these academic experiences, I have been able to cultivate a passion for research, measurement, and evaluation, which are important tools in understanding and improving educational outcomes.

During my younger years I was always involved in some sort of group or program in school - My education has always been a foremost part of my life which I hold onto dearly. The international training which I have, helped me to see this because of the double lens or double consciousness which I experienced in Canada. In my first school abroad, Columbia International College in Hamilton, Ontario, I was involved in hammerheads - a club made of students and teachers. The first assignment I participated in, "Random acts of kindness", involved distributing flowers to strangers in downtown Hamilton, Ontario. This was done to show the community that even as an international student, I felt I was a part of them. This is a skill which I think is transferable in this instance. As an international student, I can always make myself a part of the community elsewhere, thereby teaching assimilation and culture orientation to others especially at The University of Memphis.

In terms of expertise, I have the privilege of working as an Examinations Officer at The West African Examinations Council (WAEC). In this role, I am responsible for maintaining the confidentiality and security of sensitive examination materials and records. This experience provides me with firsthand insight into the problems and opportunities within educational assessment, especially in advanced conditions. I am quite well aware that there is a need for measurement tools that are accurate and effective when assessing learning and achievement of students. In light of all this, the desire to further my expertise in Higher Education research and evaluation, booms, such that my ultimate goal is to contribute to the development of assessments that can force educational improvement on a global level.

In conclusion, I have chosen to pursue an education at The University of Memphis due to this desire that I have to broaden my academic and professional experiences, and to gain the expertise needed to make a meaningful impact in the field of educational research and measurement. I am excited about the prospect of contributing to and learning from the University of Memphis community, and I am confident that this program will provide the foundation I need to achieve my professional goals.

I wish you well and I look forward to any future correspondence.
Sincerely, Temiloluwa Ladipo
